

Edible Todmorden'. London's 'Capital Growth' initiative which plans 2,012 community growing projects up and running in the metropolis by the end of 2012, relies heavily on bringing edgelands back into productive use, right there in the midst of the 'new ruins'. Allotments, urban agriculture, climate camps, they all speak to a future where prosperity without growth is within reach. These books both chart the decline and fall of our current society in graphic detail and almost incidentally, record some of the green shoots of new growth.

Martin Stott

ERRATA, VOL. XIX, NO. 2

1. Contents – the Contents pages (pp. 1–2) of the last issue (Summer 2011) did not include page numbers.
2. Reviews – The list of reviews on p. 1 should have included the following as the first item

Phillippa Bennett & Rosie Miles, eds, William Morris in the Twenty-First Century (John Purkis)

The editor sincerely apologises to all concerned for these omissions.